Emanuel's brother, Ari, was convicted of fraud in a Chicago suburb. Back in May, Ari was convicted of multiple counts of fraud and money laundering in a case involving the Markazi Trust, a group of 21 Chicago-area charities that had been accused of, among other things, running a number of illegal football pools during the 1970s and 1980s and taking in more than $2.5 million. Ari Emanuel and his brother are on the board of directors for the Trust, and he and one other board member were accused of steering hundreds of thousands of dollars to the trust for personal use. Rahm Emanuel was allegedly involved in the swindle. The problem is that Emanuel could be in violation of IRS rules, which prohibit employees from profiting from their official duties. In April, the government announced that it had reached a plea agreement with Emanuel. He was required to make an "undisclosed" payment of $5,000, the minimum for a misdemeanor, and the government dropped the felony money-laundering charges. On the campaign trail, Emanuel promised to clean up cronyism if elected speaker of the House, but that meant more than just plain old cronyism. He has been accused of what Chicagoans refer to as "earmarking," in which agencies favor a contract or special allocation to a select group of firms, but that usually involves a large payment. Meanwhile, Emanuel's campaign has made much of the fact that he is Chicago's first Jewish speaker of the House. His opponents have seized on that fact, and the first rule of political campaigning is to stick to what you can talk about. So far, Emanuel has been able to avoid talking about his conviction or the money he allegedly got from the deal, which includes the charges that Emanuel had no obligation to report. But he will be asking for the speaker's gavel, and the last thing you want to do in a hurry is to ask a question that you can't answer. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told The New York Times on Monday that she will not attempt to oust
